

A Trooper Galahad

Life is full of ups and downs, mused the colonel, as he laid on the littered desk before him an official communication just received from Department Head-Quarters, especially army life, and more especially army life in Texas. Now, what are you philosophizing about? asked his second in command, a burly major, glancing over the top of the latest home paper, three weeks old that day. Dye remember Pigott, that little cad that was court-martialled at San Antonio in 68 for quintuplicating his pay accounts? He married the widow of old Alamo Hendrix that winter. Hes worth half a million to-day, is running for Congress, and will probably be on the military committee next year, while heres Lawrence, who was judge advocate of the court that tried him, gone all to smash. And the veteran officer commanding the th Infantry and the big post at Fort Worth glanced warily along into the adjoining office, where a clerk was assorting the papers on the adjutants desk. Its the saddest case I ever heard of, said Major Brooks, tossing aside the Toledo Blade and tripping up over his own, which he had thoughtfully propped between his legs as he took his seat and thoughtlessly ignored as he left it. Damn that sabre, and the service generally! he growled, as he recovered his balance and tramped to the window. Id almost be willing to quit it as Pigott did if I could see my way to a moderate competence anywhere out of it. Lawrence was as good a soldier as we had in the 12th, and, yet, what can you do or say? The mischiefs done. And, beating the devils tattoo on the window, the major stood gloomily gazing out over the parade. It isnt Lawrence himself Im so Orderly, shut that door! cried the chief, whirling around in his chair, and tell those clerks I want it kept shut until the adjutant comes; and you stay out on the porch. It isnt Lawrence Im so sorely troubled about, Brooks. He has ability, and could pick up and do well eventually, but hes utterly discouraged and swamped.

Whats to become, though, of that poor child Ada and his little boy?
