

Martin Guerre

My God! he added, shaking his head, if he survive, it will be by the help of a miracle. Scarcely had he left the room, when the unwounded soldier carefully examined the features of the wounded one. Yes, he murmured between his teeth, they were right in saying that my exact double was to be found in the hostile army . . . Truly one would not know us apart! . . . I might be surveying myself in a mirror. I did well to look for him in the rear of the Spanish army, and, thanks to the fellow who rolled him over so conveniently with that arquebus-shot; I was able to escape the dangers of the melee by carrying him out of it.
