From the Author: How to Get Your First Major SEO Client

Author Danny Dover

I have worked with many of the web's most popular websites as an SEO consultant, and each of them shared one infuriating trait. While their SEO problems were not that difficult, the process of getting them to hire me was. Before I can explain how I overcame this barrier, let me set the context. Large clients generally suffer from many or all of the same difficulties: The potential major clients website scaled quickly but without SEO in mind. This makes going back and working with a legacy Content Management System (CMS) very difficult. The amount of inbound links is no longer a problem, but optimally passing the value of those links throughout the site is a problem. The production of content is no longer a problem, but that same content being duplicated across multiple URLs is massively devaluing that same contents value. Big organizations generally have very big websites. While the raw materials for a search engine optimized site are there, the information architecture is not. So how do you use this knowledge to get your first major SEO client? The answer is to create solutions to these problems before the potential client even identifies they exist and then sell your services to them in the correct way. Once you have done that, offer your solutions at a cheaper than market price (for your first major client only!) and make it clear you have the follow through necessary to guide these changes through their companies structure.

That sounds good but how do I establish myself as a trusted source? That is exactly the correct question! Larger companies usually need hard data in order to make these decisions. This means you will need appropriate case studies. Case studies pay dividends so always be sure to create them after working with noteworthy clients. (I even recommend doing this in exchange for a lower price, if necessary.) Since in this scenario, you havent already had a major client in the past, the best case study isnt really a case study at all. Use the potential clients site as an in progress case study and cite actual problems that exist on their site today and show them the results your previous (although smaller) clients got in the past. Back this up with inside information on how others have seen similar results at other major websites. The most cost effective way to get that evidence is to take other SEOs who already worked with major clients out to lunch or coffee in exchange for examples and anecdotes they experienced with past clients. This will both help you become more knowledgeable and improve your ability to sell yourself. This combination of pre-identifying the potential major clients problems, reassuring them that you have the stamina to push the changes through their company structure, demonstrating the type of results they will likely receive from working with you and basing all of that on case studies and actual examples make up the system you need to get your first big SEO client. While this should get you the results you need, more details are available in this book, Search Engine Optimization Secrets, in case you need more detailed instructions. This system has worked for me and it has worked for others. Now it is your turn.
